“ I love how Granny was always with us. Even when I grew older and busier, I knew she was thinking about me and there could never be enough visits. When she moved to NC, I was very little, but I know she moved once or more until she was living within a safe short walk to our door. She walked to my house often to help my Mom out with my brothers and I. One day I decided to walk to her house, it didn't cross my mind to tell my Mom first. Five minutes later I was visiting Granny - she looked a little surprised. She suggested that, in the future, I call first so she can watch for me.

My earliest clear memory of Granny was the time she took just me out in her spacious blue car; (I was used to riding around crammed in a compact car - not meant for a family of 6), she was taking time to bring me shopping for my first pair of ballet slippers. From that day on she was, (besides my Mom), the biggest fan ever.

Granny cared for our health and safety - almost to a fault. One morning, I was standing up on the back of my couch pronouncing that she should watch my new trick, but I messed up my landing and got a bloody mouth. I don't remember how bad it was, but I do remember Granny warning me just before I launched into the air. She was always giving us fair warning - of all the possible dangerous outcomes. It seems she watched us almost every day performing our many tricks for her, and we never listened. This is why her hair became white so quickly.

Because I was homeschooled, I think the active presence of Granny meant so much more. I knew she would be at my ballet performance, that she would extravagantly praise my new drawing, that she would make me another grilled cheese, that she would help me learn to tie my shoes, that she would show me how to wrap a present, or read another book, or anything I asked - unless it was dangerous.

Granny was also a loving encourager, She always said to me, ""You are so wonderful and beautiful! You know that. Right " Not one visit with my Granny ever ended without those words, 'You are so wonderful and beautiful, you know that right'.

“ To my big Sis. You were an inspiration to me all 72 years of my life. You showed me the way people are supposed to behave in life. You set an example for me that has guided me. I remember the family Christmas gatherings each year and they are among the best memories of my entire life. I love you Nette and I will miss you greatly.
